Synopsis

The mother of the filmmaker tells about how her life has gone when she first came to live in a poorly maintained canal house in Amsterdam fifty years ago. The rapid career of the father; the dramatic separation; her four children she raised alone; she tries to remember the whole story. But she doesn't want her face in the picture and there are only a few photo's. Her story is however told in a visual manner using unorthodox reconstruction techniques. In the end not everything will be as 'real' as expected.

Directors statement

Reconstructions

Time and Place is in some way a film about the melancholy of reconstruction. I wanted to make a documentary without the use of the common interview structure: so, no talking heads in this film, but an emphasis on the memories (and failing memories) of the principal character: my mother.

By directly converting her memories into image, I'm visualizing her frantic attempts to remember what happened in the house she lived in for 52 years. Memories first usually produce atmospheres, sounds, or images; the verbal "translation" takes place only a moment later. In this film we are, as it were, witnesses of the images that appear in her mind's eye at the moment she remembers them.

All the audio recordings, photographs, computer animations, sparse 16mm and video recordings that were available for these visualizations of her memory have been worked on to create a unity: photo's are not put in a "slide-show", but are integrated in the movements of the short film clips and sounds are put under the photo's to create a film-like atmosphere.

Time

Through the memories of the mother we are also the witness of the turbulent cultural and social changes that went about in the sixties seventies and eighties in Amsterdam. The father of the family is an artist that makes controversial prints with explicit sexual content and is one of the first to proclaim sexual freedom. And later on, in the eighties, the eldest son, David, is one of the first to start squatting in Amsterdam; its his way to protest against the failing housing programs of the municipality.

But this film is also a reflection on the downside of the experiments of the sixties and seventies. A father leaving his wife and 4 children because of his urge for sexual freedom and self-realization isn't exactly something that works well in the psyche of young children.

Place

The film is restricted in time by the 18th century canal house my mother lived in for 52 years. The house is situated in the famous Jordaan neighborhood. Within the time she lived there, it turned around 180 degrees: it went from the poorest, into one of the richest and most popular neighbourhoods of the city.

Visual material

Unfortunately, there was a serious lack of visual material for the film. Also the fact that my mother did not want her face to appear in the movie didn't make it easier. That's why I had to make some unorthodox decisions in the visual reconstruction of her memories - and of the conversation we had. Time and Place has therefore become more of a re-enactment of this conversation than an actual "objective" recording of it.

Towards the end of the film I reveal how far I went in this re-enactment. As a result, the film has also become a personal exploration of how to visualize something very dear.

MARTIJN VELDHOEN

Short biography

Martijn Veldhoen (Amsterdam, 1962) studied painting at the Rietveld Academy in Amsterdam from 1979 until 1984.

From the start of his career, Veldhoen has been involved in many multidisciplinary projects that incorporated various disciplines such as music, sculptural objects, and later on, video and film. In 1992 Veldhoen started making videoinstallations, and exhibited in various international galleries and museums. In recent years, Veldhoen started working on projects that can both be interpreted as video installations, experimental documentaries as well as experimental short films. These projects have been shown worldwide on exhibitions, film- and videofestivals and have won several prizes.
